An old proverb says: speak only good of the dead; but in this case there is nothing but good to be said. In her 19th year she experienced her spiritual burth and connected herself with the Presbyterian church. From her childhood she possessed a delicate con stitution, but she took as her motto: Rather a short, earnest, useful life, than a long and useless one. In her father's family she made her influence a hallowed and sacred one. To her devotion, the church at Beaton City owed much of its prosperity. Her activity was unflagging in its Sunday school. To her agency the ladies' Missionary Society owes its exis tence. From her lips, her young as sociates of both sexes failed not o receive earnest and tender Christian admonitions.
